Prof. Rosa Bruno-Jofré, PhD, Queens University, Canada

The history of alternative education practices characterized by strong transformative tones began in Latin America early in the twentieth century. These practices were motivated by the perceived needs and aspirations of the popular classes and were led by public intellectuals and leaders committed to change, left wing political organizations, and peoples' organizations. The popular universities that emerged in various countries in the early 1920s, the groups around José Carlos Mariátegui in Peru, and Sandino and the Academy at El Chipote in Nicaragua are examples of informal popular education practices. The winds of change brought by "new education" along with the political mobilization of the time reached the educational system.
